Famously, Iris Murdoch incorporated numerous aspects and oppressions of her personal life, and of her time period in general, into her novels. Freedom is the most outrageously oppressed human right in the world, most eloquently in Iris Murdoch's Under the Net, Jackson's Dilemma, and The Unicorn, and the paradigm deserves to be scrutinized.

Under the Net was Murdoch's first published novel, released way back in 1954. A reassuring fact (for damned, confidence-shitting, failed wannabe novelists like myself) was that it was a) the sixth one she wrote and b) far weaker than those she would go on to produce. Actually, I don't know if that is reassuring.

We're discussing Iris Murdoch's Under the Net. As both a philosopher and a novelist, Murdoch wanted to exploit the advantages 'of having a mind on the borders of philosophy, literature, and politics'. True to that end, her first novel, Under the Net, is a comic meditation on everything from the nature of truth to living a moral life.

Praise for Iris Murdoch and Under the Net: "Murdoch, a philosophy don at Oxford, was that rarity, a philosophical novelist who could create real characters, not premises with names attached . . . Right out of the gate she displayed all her sinuous gifts—her questing mind, her comic skepticism, her wildly entangled plots."
